Pursue Happiness Wisely

WHO does not want to be happy? The quest for happiness is one of the most widespread and earnest pursuits of man. Once he has assured himself of the bare necessities of life—food, clothing and shelter—man wants happiness.

Recognizing this deep-seated desire in man, the founding fathers of the United States republic, in their Declaration of Independence, stated: "We hold these truths self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness." Wisely, those men distinguished between happiness and the pursuit of happiness. They did not state that Happiness was an inalienable right as were Life and Liberty, but only the pursuit of Happiness was such a right.

All humans might be said to engage in this pursuit, yet how few realize their goal, happiness! Why? It could be because they pursue it too eagerly, or selfishly, or in a misguided way. In brief, it might be said that so many do not realize the happiness they pursue because they do not pursue it wisely.

The fact is that the more strenuously we pursue happiness the more elusive it becomes. If we reach out for it too eagerly, it becomes a mere will-o'-the-wisp. The ancient Greek philosophers known as the Epicureans might be cited as an example of the folly of pursuing happiness for its own sake. Their philosophy was that the purpose of life was its enjoyment; not necessarily alone in matters of food and drink, as do their counterparts in modern times; but also the enjoyment of the better things of life, such as friendships. But making selfish enjoyment an end in itself at last proved frustrating, as can be seen in the fact that so many of them in old age left this world by their own hand. Their living for pleasure had not brought them lasting happiness.

It may, therefore, be said that happiness is most likely to be realized as a by-product of pursuing a wise course. In this, as in so many other matters that involve human conduct and activity, the inspired Word of God, the Holy Bible, sheds light on our paths. Thus it tells us that the possession of wisdom, which means the ability to apply knowledge in line with God's righteous principles, contributes to one's happiness: "Happy is the man that has found wisdom, and the man that gets discernment, for having it as gain is better than having silver . . . [and] gold itself. It is more precious than corals, and all other delights of yours cannot be made equal to it. Length of days is in its right hand; in its left hand there are riches and glory. Its ways are ways of pleasantness, and all its roadways are peace. It is a tree of life to those taking hold of it, and those keeping fast hold of it are to be called happy."—Prov. 3:13-18.

Yes, man may have an inalienable right to pursue happiness, but he must pursue it wisely if he would realize it. He cannot follow a course of crass materialism, be motivated by the love of money, and expect to realize happiness. Concerning the folly of this course, the Holy Bible warns us: "Those who are determined to be rich fall into temptation and a snare and many senseless and hurtful desires, which plunge men into destruction and ruin. For the love of money is a root of all sorts of injurious things, and by reaching out for this love some have . . . stabbed themselves all over with many pains."—1 Tim. 6:9, 10.

However, pursuing happiness wisely requires not only having worthwhile goals but being modest in your ambitions and moderate in your striving. Otherwise, you may well be frustrated because of not realizing your goals, or not realizing them as soon as you would like, or you might find yourself paying such a high price as to make it a Pyrrhic victory, one not worth the price you had to pay for it. Remember, "wisdom is with the modest ones." (Prov. 11:2) There is no getting around it: 'It is a means of great gain, this godly devotion with self-sufficiency. For we have brought nothing into the world, and neither can we carry anything out. So having food and clothing, let us be content with these things.' How can you be happy if you are not even contented?—1 Tim. 6:6-8.

Today, more than ever before, men seek happiness by pursuing worldly pleasures. But the irony of that pursuit is that the more you have the more you want. Self-indulgence does not result in happiness, any more than does heaping up mere worldly treasures. But wholesome, worthwhile pursuits can. Warmhearted, mature and intelligent families and groups of friends can spend an evening together, providing happiness for one another simply by sharing their acquired knowledge, their varied experiences and their appreciation of values. All such is pursuing happiness wisely.—Prov. 27:17.

But even here, in seeking the happiness that comes from bringing happiness to others, by sharing worthwhile things, we may not overlook the just rule, "All things, therefore, that you want men to do to you, you also must likewise do to them." If you are a married man, concentrate on making your own wife happy; do not compete with another man in trying to make his wife happy. Are you a wife? Then concentrate on making your own husband, not some other woman's husband, happy. It may not at the moment seem to be as exciting or interesting, but it is more likely to result in happiness!—Matt. 7:12.

In the final analysis, though, the greatest and most lasting happiness depends upon our relationship with our Maker, the great God Jehovah. Knowing and serving him are the most rewarding things we can do. As was prophetically written of our Exemplar in this regard, Jesus Christ: "To do your will, O my God, I have delighted." And as he showed in his Sermon on the Mount, those who are happy are those who are conscious of their spiritual need, the mild-tempered, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peaceable.—Ps. 40:8; Matt. 5:3-9.

So pursue happiness wisely; not selfishly, not too ambitiously, not too eagerly. In particular, let happiness come to you by reason of your love of God and neighbor!

Why Put Your Trust in

MANY mil-

persons of this generation put their trust in Adolf Hitler, only to be bitterly disillusioned. Others blindly put their hopes in Communist leaders, or in such dictators as Perón, Trujillo and Batista, only to regret it sadly. During World War II practically all the Western world put its trust in men who held out the hope of four freedoms for all: freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from want and freedom from fear. But today there is less of such freedoms in the world than there was before World War II began, and again the hopes of men have been frustrated, even as was the hope that World War I would make the world safe for democracy.

Such has been the experience of men not only in modern times but ever since men began to look to human rulers and put their trust in them. How fitting therefore the counsel of the ancient inspired psalmist: "Do not put your trust in nobles, nor in the son of earthling man, to whom no salvation belongs. His spirit goes out, he goes back to his ground; in that day his thoughts do perish"—Ps. 146:3, 4.

But there is an exception; there is one ruler in whom we can place our hope. And yet not really an exception, for today he is no mere "earthling man." He is one who, far from disillusioning those who put their trust in him, will far exceed mankind's fondest expectations. He is the God-appointed ruler of humankind, the one of whom it was foretold, "Indeed, in his name nations will hope." That one is Jesus Christ.—Matt. 12:21; Isa. 42:4, LXX.

Jesus Christ?

Who is this one? How does he differ from other rulers?

Why can you put your trust in this one, Jesus Christ? Because his Father, Jehovah God, has committed to him all power and authority "in heaven and on the earth." So there is just no limiting his ability to accomplish whatever he chooses. Further, there will never be any question about ending his rule because of his 'returning to his ground,' for though he died once, he is now "living forever and ever." No ordinary ruler is he, but the one of whom it is written, "the King of those who rule as kings and Lord of those who rule as lords, the one alone [of all such kings and lords] having immortality," and therefore not subject to death.—Matt. 28:18; Rev. 1:18; 1 Tim. 6:15, 16.

A ruler that will never die, endowed with all power and authority, might well cause us to fear, were it not for the fact that he excels as greatly in righteous principles and in unselfish love as he does in power and deathlessness. In striking contrast with so many of the rulers of this world who exploit their subjects, this one loved his subjects so much that he impoverished himself, suffered and even died on their behalf. As he himself stated it: "The Son of man came, not to be ministered to, but to minister and to give his soul a ransom in exchange for many." Yes, as one of his followers tells us, this ruler, Jesus Christ, "emptied himself" of his existence in a Godlike form, "and took a slave's form and came to be in the likeness of men. More than that, when he found himself in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient as far as death, yes, death on a torture stake." Could unselfish regard for one's subjects go any farther? Surely this is the King, the Ruler, in whom to put your trust!—Matt. 20:28; Phil. 2: 7, 8.

A Historical Character

Perhaps at this point someone will say, What a beautiful dream! If only it were true! But what proof is there that this Jesus Christ is truly the Son of God, that what the Bible says about him is true? Why, there are some that even deny that Jesus Christ is a historical character, that he ever existed.

But that should not surprise you. Rarely is a striking truth presented without one or more persons questioning it. As for doubting the very existence of Jesus Christ, only someone who has presupposed in his mind that there was no such person and who therefore turns a deaf ear to all the evidence available on Christ's being a historical character could hold such a position. In fact, it would be difficult to find any writing more saturated with prejudiced emotionalism than much of that which assays to prove that Jesus Christ is not a historical character.

In the first place, the four Gospels that record Jesus' life have all the earmarks of truth. They give evidence of having been written with the utmost candor, not even flattering the followers of Jesus, the very ones that recorded his life. If one were to doubt their record, he ought to ascribe a plausible motive for the writers' trying to foist such a hoax upon their fellowmen.

Not that proof of the fact of Jesus' existence depends solely upon the four Gospel accounts. No serious scholar of these matters will doubt for a moment that the apostle Paul wrote the letters to the Romans and the Corinthians as found in the Christian Greek Scriptures, and these leave no doubt as to the basic essentials of Jesus' existence. There is no question about the apostle Paul's being an intelligent man, nor about his sincerity. Well, he put such trust in Jesus Christ as the Son of God that he gave up a high position in the Jewish polity to become a bitterly persecuted follower of Jesus Christ.—2 Cor. 11:22-33; Gal. 1:13, 14.

More than that, there is the testimony of the early Talmudical accounts of Jesus, on the basis of which Klausner, a Jewish scholar, says in his Jesus of Nazareth: "It is unreasonable to question either the existence of Jesus (as certain scholars have done in the eighteenth century and in our own time) or his general character as it is depicted in the Gospels." And again, "To cast wholesale doubt on the historicity of the Synoptic Gospels becomes more impossible the more widely we study all the branches of Judaism during the period of the Second Temple."

There is also the reference by the Jewish historian Josephus in his Antiquities of the Jews, Book XX, chapter ix, paragraph 1, which tells that the high priest Ananus "assembled the sanhedrim of judges, and brought before them the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, whose name was James," and which reference has never been challenged. Note also the testimony of the pagan Roman historian Tacitus, as found in his Annals, Book 15, paragraph 44. In telling of the persecution of the Christians, he, among other things, states: "The originator of the name, one Christus, had been executed in the reign of Tiberius by order of the Administrator Pontius Pilate." Clearly, to deny that Jesus actually existed is to "deny all historic reality," as scholar Klausner so well observes.

The Son of God

Of course, for us to put our trust in Jesus Christ he must not only be a historical character but truly be the one the Hebrew prophets foretold, the Messiah, and be what he and his followers claimed for him, the Son of God. Was he the Son of God in a unique and direct sense, such as has not been true of anyone on earth before him or since he was on earth?—John 10: 29-39.

The answer to that question must be an unequivocal, Yes. Why? Because of the testimony of the Gospel writers, as well as of himself, which, as we have seen, bears all the earmarks of honesty and candor. Not only did his apostle Peter state to him, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God," but Jesus himself said of himself: "I am God's Son."—Matt. 16:16; John 10:36.

That the apostle Peter knew whereof he spoke, and that Jesus was not to be charged with a vainglorious claim, is apparent from the miracles he was able to perform. Thus we read that early in his ministry "he went around throughout the whole of Galilee, teaching in their synagogues and preaching the good news of the kingdom and curing every sort of disease and every sort of infirmity among the people. . . . and they brought him all those faring badly, distressed with various diseases and torments, demon-possessed and epileptic and paralyzed persons, and he cured them." On one occasion when his disciples were in a boat and were threatened by a storm, "he rebuked the winds and the sea, and a great calm set in," so that his disciples asked, "What sort of person is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him?" What sort of person? No mere son of Adam but the Son of God! On another occasion he raised from the dead his friend Lazarus, who had been dead four days.—Matt. 4: 23, 24; 8:23-27; John 11:1-44.

So there is every reason for you to put your trust in the King of kings, Jesus Christ. Look to him to bring about righteous conditions upon the earth. He will bring forth justice to the nations, put an end to sickness, sorrow, pain and dying and cause God's will to be done upon earth as in heaven.—Isa. 42:1; Rev. 21:4; Matt. 6:10; Gen. 22:18; Gal. 3:16.

Putting your trust in him, however, means more than merely believing the foregoing evidence as true. You must exercise faith, that is, let faith move you to do something about it. As the disciple James points out, "faith without works is dead." Learn what God's will is for you by a study of his Word together with the helps God has provided in our day. Associate with others who are likewise desirous of knowing and doing God's will. And as you learn, act upon the knowledge gained, for, as Jesus said, "if you know these things, happy you are if you do them."—Jas. 2:26; John 13:17.

Putting your trust in the King Jesus Christ, you will never be disappointed but can look forward to realizing the blessings of his rule forever, even as promised you in God's Word: "The righteous themselves will possess the earth, and they will reside forever upon it."—Ps. 37:29.

WHEN General George Washington stood amidst his cold and embittered soldiers at Valley Forge, he said: "Some day men will think this liberty easy." But freedoms won have never been easy. Even those freedoms associated with the flag salute and the pledge of allegiance have been realized only after years of struggle and much sorrow.

The adoption of the flag of the United States was of slow growth. It was on June 14, 1777, that the Congress of the United States gave the flag official recognition. The flag then was composed of thirteen stripes and thirteen stars. To prevent the flag from becoming unwieldy with the addition of a stripe for each state, Congress, on July 4, 1818, passed a resolution providing that the stripes should remain thirteen in number in honor of the original states, and that new states should be represented by stars. In 1960, with the addition of Hawaii, the stars reached their present number of 50.

By presidential proclamation in 1916, June 14 has been set aside as Flag Day, an observance that since then has been celebrated throughout the United States.

The pledge of allegiance, however, dates back to 1892. In the early 1890's a campaign was conducted by the Youth's Com- panion magazine to arouse patriotism in the schools and emphasize the duties of citizenship. For the first time stress was placed on having the American flag wave over the nation's public schools. As the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America approached, the Companion staff conceived the idea of having Columbus Day, October 12, 1892, made a national holiday, by presidential proclamation. The program planned on this occasion was to reach its climax in a salute to the flag, spoken in unison by schoolchildren.

Two members of the Companion staff, namely, Francis Bellamy and James B. Upham, allegedly wrote the pledge for the occasion. In its original form, it said:

"I pledge allegiance to my flag, and to the Republic for which it stands; one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

In 1923 the words "my flag" were changed to

"the flag of the United States," and in 1924, the words "of America" were added. The pledge became popular. In 1907 the state of Kansas made the flag salute compulsory for public schoolchildren. Such regulations became common in many states in the years that followed.

Nationalism and Hysteria

With the rise of Adolf Hitler to power in Germany, a wave of patriotic hysteria swept the world. During 1935 this patriotic zeal showed itself in a drive for the enforcement of State laws requiring students in all public schools to salute the American flag.

Because of widespread opposition, the 1935 drive for such laws resulted in a compulsory flag-salute statute in only one state—Massachusetts. But similar statutes had been previously passed in many states. In fact, in about half the states in America the flag salute was made a compulsory part of the public school curriculum.

When the 1935 drive stalled, attempts were made to secure the same results by an interpretation of existing laws, which, in many instances, required local boards of education or superintendents to provide a system of flag "exercises." In Pennsylvania, the attorney general construed a statute to permit local education boards in their discretion to compel teachers and pupils to submit to flag salutes on penalty of suspension.

Following the attorney general's opinion, pupils refusing to salute the flag were suspended in several districts. Similar suspensions were made from one end of the United States to the other. In Massachusetts, under the mandatory law passed in 1935, Carleton B. Nichols, an eight-year-old pupil, was suspended when he refused to salute the flag. A lower court refused a writ of mandamus, the prerogative writ to compel the School Board to reinstate the boy and fulfill its duty.

Religious Objection

In the majority if not all of these and previous cases, the ground for refusing to salute was religious. The pupils were sincere Christians. They had come from families whose parents were Jehovah's witnesses. Like the early Christians, Jehovah's witnesses believe in obeying all human laws that do not conflict with God's laws. Saluting the flag is considered by the Witnesses to be a religious act in which they cannot conscientiously participate. They view the act to be a violation of the Second Commandment and of Christian scriptures warning against idolatry. (Ex. 20:4, 5; 1 John 5:21) Like the early Christians, their stand against the flag salute is little understood, as pointed out by the book The American Character, in the chapter "Unity and Liberty":

"Carlton Hayes pointed out long ago that the ritual of flag-worship and oath-taking in an American school is a religious observance. . . . That these daily rituals are religious has been at last affirmed by the Supreme Court. . . . To the overwhelming majority of the American people, the objections of the Witnesses were as unintelligible as the objections of the Christians to making a formal sacrifice to the Divine Emperor were to Trajan and Pliny."

The attitude of early Christians toward patriotic ceremonies is well recorded. For example, A History of Civilization, on page 137, says:

"To hold this motley collection of peoples in a common allegiance, to give them something like a national flag as a symbol of this unity, the emperor was deified. . . . Simple rites of sacrifice to him were added to local religions and local rites. . . . The true Christian, then, could not bring himself to make what to an outsider was merely a decent gesture, like raising one's hat today when the flag goes by in a parade."

Also, the book Those About to Die by D. P. Mannix, on pages 135 and 137, states:

"Christians . . . refused to sacrifice to the emperor's genius—roughly equivalent today to refusing to salute the flag or repeat the oath of allegiance."

Today Jehovah's witnesses, like those early Christians, maintain that to salute the flag is to perform an act of worship toward it. They hold that such devotion may be rendered only to the Supreme Being of the Universe, Jehovah God.

It might interest many Americans to know that the British do not generally salute their flag. It is to them merely a standard, the Royal Family receiving the honor bestowed on the symbol of Empire.

Persecution and the Court

A fierce controversy raged through the public school system of America in the 1930's and '40's because of the compulsory flag-salute statutes. Oftentimes the controversy was carried far beyond the schools and resulted in brutal mobbings, arson, and all other sorts of unlawful persecution, official and unofficial.

On June 3, 1940, the Supreme Court of the United States added fuel to the flames by shifting the responsibility for the enforcement or nonenforcement of the flag-salute regulations onto the individual school systems. As a result, many thousands of children were denied the right of a public school education. Terrible persecution of Jehovah's witnesses followed.

On June 1, 1940, seventy Witnesses in Odessa, Texas, were jailed and grilled through the night regarding their unwillingness to salute the flag. On June 2 all seventy were turned over to a mob of over a thousand, who chased and stoned them five miles down the railroad right-of-way. On June 22 a Witness was tarred and feathered in Parco, Wyoming. On June 29 seven of Jehovah's witnesses in Richwood, West Virginia, were forced to drink large amounts of castor oil, tied together with a police department rope and marched through and out of town. In August 1940 a Nebraska Witness was lured from his house, abducted and castrated. David R. Manwaring, professor of political science, in his book Render unto Caesar, says of this senseless persecution: "It became fashionable in many places to jail Witnesses on sight 'just in case.'" A survey by the National Office of the American Civil Liberties Union found that some 40 instances of mob violence in 44 states, involving about 1,500 men, women and children of Jehovah's witnesses, had taken place during 1940 alone. More than 9,000 arrests of Witnesses were recorded from 1940 to 1942.

Punishment was inflicted even on little children and their parents. In Grindstone, Pennsylvania, Stanley Brachna, age twelve, was knocked around by his teacher, thrown against a desk and struck. The teacher tried to force him to salute by holding up his hand. Anna Prinos, age thirteen, was whipped and choked by her principal. She was sent home with great welts on her back from beatings. There were instances where children were taken away from their parents and committed to institutions by the courts. The senseless brutality accomplished little but to thrust Jehovah's witnesses into the limelight. Their courage and integrity to Christian worship won for them many staunch admirers. In fact, no small number of their persecutors became Jehovah's witnesses as a result.

Persecution Backfired

In 1941 persecution against Jehovah's witnesses began to backfire. Newspaper editorials called for a halt to the persecution of innocent people. In its November 24, 1941, editorial, the Los Angeles Times said that

"this Flag-salute business has gone to absurd lengths and that it is time to call a halt. It is about time the State recognize that patriotism cannot be compelled by law."

The Open Forum, published by the Southern California Branch of the Civil Liberties Union, in its issue of December 13, 1941, stated:

"It is high time that we came to our senses regarding this matter of flag-saluting. Jehovah's Witnesses are not disloyal Americans. In devotion to this country they exhibit as great interest certainly as the average American and probably greater. They are not given to law-breaking in general, but lead decent, orderly lives, contributing their share to the common good."

The American Civil Liberties Union then appealed to all Americans to stop the cruel persecutions directed against Jehovah's witnesses.

Historic Reversal

On June 8, 1942, three Supreme Court justices, Black, Douglas and Murphy, voluntarily took the unprecedented action of publicly declaring that they considered the 1940 "Gobitis" flag-salute case "wrongly decided." Shortly thereafter a United States District Court in West Virginia granted an injunction against the State Board of Education of West Virginia, prohibiting the enforcement of their compulsory flag-salute statute. The State appealed to the Supreme Court. Then on June 14, 1943, "Flag Day," the High Court handed down its opinion in the case. In a well-considered and exhaustive opinion, the Court by a vote of 6 to 3 reversed its former holding in the "Gobitis" case.* The final result is that those who have conscientious scruples against saluting the flag do not have to choose between violating their conscience and having their children deprived of their schooling.

The very fact that the Supreme Court picked Flag Day, June 14, to announce its historic reversal should be a sobering reminder to every American of the significance of this decision. This was no easy or small thing for the Court to do. For in the very midst of the second world war, the Court defended—indeed expanded upon—Constitutional freedoms. It did so despite the opposition of political authorities. It did so in behalf of an unpopular minority. And it did so in behalf of one of the most unpopular of freedoms—especially in wartime—the freedom NOT to salute the flag. By its unprecedented decision, the Supreme Court on this day, June 14, 1943, reassured all Americans, minorities and majorities alike, that the rights for which the flag stands would be honored and protected by law.

On this same day—June 14, 1943—half-way around the world in Australia, a member of the British Commonwealth, something also very significant happened. After a two-and-a-half-year legal battle, the case Adelaide Company of Jehovah's Witnesses, Inc., v. The Commonwealth (67 C.L.R. 116, 124 [1943]) was heard in the High Court of Australia. On June 14, 1943, the Court gave a four-to-one victory to Jehovah's witnesses. The Court held that, although Jehovah's witnesses are not fervent nationalists, they are not to be deprived of their freedom. The Australian case, too, involved a reversal of the stand formerly taken by the government there. The Court ruled that Jehovah's witnesses were free to carry on their religious activity and that their work was not prejudicial to the official prosecution of the war.

A Need for Reflection

In the twenty-two years that have passed since then, a whole new generation has grown up, many of whom have never heard of this great struggle for freedom. The legal decisions of 1943 seem a long time ago. And, too, in this period many new legislators, educators and public officials have taken office. Their busy schedules may not have afforded them the opportunity to read law that dates back many years. Some of these officials may be tempted to coerce flag saluting.

In recent years, with the rise of nationalism throughout the world, there has been a noticeable crop of compulsory flag-salute laws reappearing in various states. In New York, North Dakota, New Jersey, Massachusetts and other states, officials have had to be reminded of the Supreme Court's flag decision and Constitutional law. Last year Governor Richard A. Hughes of New Jersey wisely vetoed a bill designed to force all children in New Jersey public schools to participate in the salute to the flag and the pledge of allegiance. The bill was, on May 18, 1964, passed by the New Jersey Assembly 46-0. In his veto message, Governor Hughes said: "It ill becomes a state legislature to turn its back on the (Federal) Constitution by seeking to curtail anew the religious and civil liberties of those individual beliefs, however unorthodox, which are protected by the 1st and 14th amendments." The Massachusetts Senate, on March 15, 1965, rejected by one vote, 17-16, a bill meant to compel public schoolteachers and their pupils to pledge allegiance to the flag daily, contrary to Constitutional guarantees.

Official Control versus Free Will

The flag-salute struggle of twenty years ago culminated in what Time magazine considered a victory for religious freedom. It was a victory for freedom of conscience for all Americans, which no legislator should want to spurn or bypass. The popular American Protestant journal the Christian Century, in a favorable editorial, stated that Supreme Court Justice Jackson's freedom-of-conscience passage "should become part of the 'American Scriptures,' to be memorized and taken to heart by every patriot." A few choice sentences from Justice Jackson's opinion, which he wrote for the majority in 1943, as well as a brief expression by Justice Black, are set out below. The thoughts therein are worthy of our serious consideration. Justice Black wrote:

"Words uttered under coercion are proof of loyalty to nothing but self-interest. Love of country must spring from willing hearts and free minds . . . [and] neither our domestic tranquility in peace nor our martial effort in war depends on compelling little children to participate in a ceremony which ends in nothing for them but a fear of spiritual condemnation."

Justice Jackson concluded as follows:

"We think the action of the local authorities in compelling the flag salute and pledge transcends constitutional limitations on their power and invades the sphere of intellect and spirit which it is the purpose of the First Amendment . . . to reserve from all official control."

"To believe that patriotism will not flourish if patriotic ceremonies are voluntary and spontaneous instead of a compulsory routine is to make an unflattering estimate of the appeal of our institutions to free minds. . . . freedom to differ is not limited to things that do not matter much. That would be a mere shadow of freedom. The test of its substance is the right to differ as to things that touch the heart of the existing order: If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."

Concerning this fight for freedom, Professor Manwaring observed: "The legal battle over the compulsory flag salute was exclusively a Jehovah's Witness fight." But the victory is one for all Americans. With this thought in mind the American Bar Association (in its Bill of Rights Review, the 1942 summer edition) commended Jehovah's witnesses for their courageous stand for Constitutional rights during those most trying years. For it took eight long years, with six trips to the Supreme Court, plus the changing of minds of a requisite number of justices, to reach the desired end. Little wonder that A. L. Wirin, attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, said: "In the field of religious freedom, guaranteed by the First Amendment to the United States Constitution, no group in the nation has rendered a greater service" than Jehovah's witnesses.

While the right of all Americans to freedom of conscience has been strengthened by the 1943 Supreme Court's decision, yet, as Thomas Jefferson declared, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

The Art of TYPING

By "Awake!" correspondent in Uruguay

HAVE you ever received a handwritten letter that had so many illegible words in it that you had to guess at what the writer was trying to tell you? In business affairs such a letter could cause costly misunderstandings. Perhaps you felt like telling the person: "Please learn to type!"

Typing is an art that is not difficult to learn, and it makes an immense difference in the legibility and neatness of your correspondence. Writing is a form of communication, but if you cannot make yourself understood, you defeat your purpose in writing. Mastering the art of typing is worth the effort it takes. You would find it to be of great value to you not only when writing personal correspondence to friends but also when communicating with businessmen, when applying for a job, when seeking information, and so forth. There are many occasions when you would find knowledge of the art of typing valuable. Then too it is much faster than handwriting. A letter can be written on a typewriter in a fraction of the time it takes to do it by hand.

World affairs would be seriously crippled without typewriters. Business establishments, governmental offices, educational institutions, writers of newspapers and magazines and many others would be lost without it. Yet it was not so long ago that a writing machine was nothing more than an idea in the minds of some clever inventors.

The earliest record of a writing machine is in the British Patent Office, which received a patent application for one in 1714. Later, in 1808, an Italian inventor developed one for an Italian countess who was blind. It helped her to carry on her correspondence as well as being a source of enjoyment for her. It was in 1856 that a writing machine was developed that had the familiar basket-like arrangement of type that is basic in the design of most modern machines, but it was not until 1873 that the first of the commercially successful machines began to appear. From then down to the present time a great number of typewriter models have been produced, with constant improvements changing them gradually into the neat, smoothly operating models we have today.

Learn the Art

Notwithstanding the important role typewriters play in modern living, there are many people who do not know how to type. They may have never had the opportunity to learn this valuable art. If you are one of these and can afford to buy a typewriter, you might find it advantageous to do so. With regular practice, you can quickly learn the art.

There are many helpful instruction booklets that explain how to master the keyboard of a typewriter, and by following their instructions and practicing on a typewriter, you can soon learn to type rapidly without looking at the keys. It is to your advantage to learn the right way to type. Using two fingers or keeping your eyes shifting between your copy and the keyboard establishes a habit that will be difficult to break when you want greater efficiency.

When you see a stenographer typing speedily, she is not thinking about what keys to strike, any more than a musician thinks about what keys he should strike on a piano. The art of typing depends to a great extent upon habit. Cultivate the right habit in the beginning and you will find that with practice you will be able to type rapidly without giving any thought to the keyboard. Your fingers will automatically locate the correct keys. In fact, if you begin thinking about which keys to press, your typing speed will most likely slow down and you will begin to make more errors than usual.

The touch method of typing makes use of all your fingers. This, of course, contributes measurably to the great speed of writing that is possible on a typewriter. Ten fingers properly located on a keyboard can press more keys in a given space of time than two fingers that must move all over the keyboard. Learning the ten-finger touch technique may seem to be a bit slow at first, but with practice your speed will improve as you become more familiar with the location of the letters on the keyboard.

The essential feature of the touch system is the home keys. These are the keys upon which your fingers rest most of the time. Each finger has a certain home key assigned to it in the second from the bottom row of keys. From these home keys they move to assigned keys in the other rows. By learning what keys are assigned to each finger, a person can soon, with practice, establish the proper typing habit. In time he will find that he is giving less and less thought to these keys. Habit takes over, causing his fingers to move automatically to their assigned keys. But more is required than knowing the keyboard.

An expert typist will tell you that the secret of good typing is a continuous, even rhythm. This is what you should strive for from the beginning rather than speed. Speed will increase naturally as your ability improves, but rhythm must be consciously cultivated. Once you have made it part of your typing technique, you will turn out more and better work than the person who has an irregular rhythm.

It is important to resist the temptation to keep glancing at the keyboard or at the paper upon which you are typing. This can become a bad habit that will break your typing rhythm, increase the number of your errors and slow down your typing. Each time you glance away from what you are copying, you run the chance of picking up the wrong word or line when looking back at the copy. Sometimes you may even have to stop to locate where you were on the page. So learn from the beginning to keep your eyes on what you are copying. If you are composing a letter on the typewriter, keep your eyes on what you are writing rather than on the keyboard.

Quality

The quality of the work you turn out with a typewriter depends upon a number of things. If you strike the keys with uneven pressure, you will have some letters that will be light and others dark. An electric typewriter, of course, eliminates that problem. Also, if your machine is not in proper alignment, it will produce a ragged line, with some letters high and others low, some too close and others too far apart. A typewriter expert in Uruguay can tell at a glance whether a typewriter is in alignment by writing the line: "Amaranath sasesusos Oronoco Initiation secedes Uruguay Philadelphia."

Even the inked ribbon can affect the quality of typewritten work. An inferior ribbon, such as one made of a poor grade of cotton, will not give a clean imprint but will cause the open spaces in such letters as "e" and "o" to fill in. If a cotton ribbon is used, make certain that it is made of only the best grade of cotton. A much superior, but more expensive, ribbon is made of silk or nylon. It will give cleaner impressions with sharper letters than cotton and last much longer.

What to Do with Errors

Learning the art of typing includes learning how to correct errors. Being imperfect, you are certain to make some errors that spoil what you have done. Rather than retype it all, you can correct the errors, if they are not extensive, without noticeably affecting the appearance of your work. Erasing, however, should be kept to a minimum, and it should not be done with a vigorous rubbing of the eraser. Short, gentle strokes in one direction should be used to avoid leaving an unsightly spot on the paper. In some instances the entire mistake does not need to be erased.

Suppose an "s" was struck instead of an "e." Rather than removing the entire letter, you need only to erase the sides of the "s," leaving the top and bottom curves and the center crossbar. An "e" will now fit beautifully on top of the "s" with hardly any indication of a correction. Now let us say that a "c" is struck when it should have been a "d" or an "o." After first lightening the letter a little by gentle strokes with an eraser, a "d" or an "o" can be superimposed on it, and the error will go unnoticed. In case an "i" is printed instead of a "t," very little needs to be done to correct the mistake. Take a razor blade and lightly scrape away the left-hand foot of the "i." The "t" will then superimpose on the "i," neatly hiding the mistake. There are a number of other ways to correct typing errors, and these can be learned with experience.

Erasure dust can become a troublesome thing if it is allowed to fall into the mechanism of a typewriter. It can cause improper operation of some of the many moving parts in the machine. Instead of erasing where the type strikes the roller or platen, move the carriage to one side as far as it will go, and then erase errors there so that the eraser dust falls outside the machine. The cleaner a typewriter is kept, the fewer repair bills you will have.

No matter whether you are a student in school, a housewife, a businessman or a common laborer, the art of typing can prove to be of great value to you. Because we live in a world in which writing plays an important part in everyday living, there are many occasions in which a knowledge of this art can be put to good use. The art of typing can be a great aid to anyone who wants his written communications to be neat in appearance and easy to read.

A Father

TALKS TO HIS SONS

"DADDY, why can't they bring the baby right to our house? Did Mommy have to go to the hospital for it?" asks five-year-old Bobby. This and other simple inquiries often dumbfound parents of our modern age. What are we to say? they ask. How can we talk about sex and procreation to these little folks? For an answer, consider, for example, how a Christian father might discuss such matters with his boys.

"Bring your Bible, Bobby, and let's see if we can find an answer to your question."

While Bobby runs for his Bible, father invites his older boy, John, to sit in on the discussion. When Bobby comes back, his father opens the Bible and says: "Here is what the Bible book of Psalms [139:1, 13, 14] says about a baby inside its mother: 'O Jehovah, you have searched through me, and you know me. For you yourself produced my kidneys; you kept me screened off in the belly of my mother. I shall laud you because in a fear-inspiring way I am wonderfully made.'"

"Does that mean God makes the baby grow in Mommy's tummy?" asks wide-eyed Bobby.

"No, not her stomach, Bobby, but in another place near her tummy. You see, every mother has a special place in her body, wonderfully made by God, where a new baby starts from a very tiny beginning and is protected as it keeps growing. This place is like a baby's cradle, you might say, because the baby lies snugly inside it for about nine months.

After that it is big enough, so it is time for the baby to be born."

"Is that why Mommy was so fat when she left?" inquires Bobby.

"That's right. When the baby is tiny, the place where it grows is small like a balloon without any air in it. Then as the baby gets bigger, this area stretches just like a balloon when you blow it up. But because Jehovah God arranged this wonderful miracle of birth, the place where the baby grows can stretch and stretch and it does not break. In the beginning it is about the size of a pear, but right before the baby is born, it is almost as big as a watermelon."

"But how does the baby get out of Mommy?" asks Bobby.

"When the baby can eat and breathe by itself it comes out of its mother through a special opening between the mother's legs. You came out of your Mommy in the same way."

"But, Daddy, how does the baby see when it is still inside Mommy, and how does it get something to eat when it is hungry?" asks Bobby with a puzzled look.

"At that stage the baby does not have to see—not until it comes out and is separated from its mother. And while the baby is inside the mother, the Creator arranged that it would be well fed through a tube or cord."

"Do you mean a cord like a string?"

"No, I mean a cord about as big around as your finger and maybe twenty inches long. One end of the cord joins the baby's little tummy to its mother, and through this cord it receives the food that makes it grow. When it is born the cord is cut close to the baby's tummy, and the baby can then begin to receive milk through its own little mouth."

"Did I have a cord like that, Daddy?"

"Yes, Bobby, you did, but now all that is left is the mark in the middle of your tummy where the cord was attached."

"Oh, I think I understand now, Dad."

"Good, but you will find that other questions will come up about these things from time to time; and when they do, never hesitate to ask me. Now, why don't you go outside to play?"

"All right, Dad. Thanks."

"One thing I've often wondered about, Dad," says twelve-year-old John. "Why is sex such a hush-hush matter, and why do so many treat it as if it were a shameful thing even to talk about?"

"I'm glad you raised this point, John. It is true that there is quite a lot of confusion about how to view sex, but this is largely because people fail to consider seriously what God's Word, the Bible, has to say on the subject. There is nothing dishonorable about sex and the sex organs of man and woman. The wrong comes when sex relations between people are not in harmony with God's rules."

"So there is nothing shameful about sex when God's rules are obeyed?" asks John.

"That's right. Now, let's go to the Bible and we will see how honorable this divine arrangement is. Read Hebrews 13:4, Johnny."

"Here it is, Dad. It says: 'Let marriage be honorable among all, and the marriage bed be without defilement, for God will judge fornicators and adulterers.'"

"So you see, Johnny, this is a very honorable arrangement that God made. It is sacred. But fornicators defile it, making it lose its purity and cleanness. Fornicators are people, men or women, who have sex relations outside of marriage, against God's rules. Those who do not live by his rules regarding sex will be judged adversely. Now turn to the apostle Paul's words at First Corinthians, chapter 7, verse two, and we read: 'Let each man have his own wife and each woman have her own husband.' This agrees with God's original purpose when he brought Eve to Adam to be his helper. Notice here at Genesis, chapter 2, verse 24, where it says: 'That is why a man will leave his father and his mother and he must stick to his wife and they must become one flesh.' From these texts we see that it's God's will for a man and his wife to stick together and to have sex relations with each other and with nobody else."

"Dad, maybe I'm dumb, but there is something I don't understand."

"What is that, Johnny?"

"Well, just what do you mean by sex relations?"

"This refers to an expression of love between a husband and his wife. It is a time when a husband and his wife are very close together, away from other people, and they feel very much in love with each other. It is during this time of very deep love that the husband lies close to his wife so that his male organ fits naturally into her birth canal. The husband's male sex cells go out of his body through his male organ right into his wife's birth canal. These sex cells move through the canal, and if an egg cell is there in the wife, one of her husband's male cells joins with her egg cell and it begins to grow into a baby inside the mother."

"Oh, now I understand. But, Dad, since this arrangement of God is honorable, why does it say that Adam and Eve were ashamed because of being naked after they ate the forbidden fruit?"

"The nakedness they felt was like the guilty feeling we might get if we do something wrong. But before Adam and Eve sinned, they were not ashamed, as Genesis 2:25 says: 'Both of them continued to be naked, the man and his wife, and yet they did not become ashamed.' So you see, Johnny, Jehovah God did not make any part of the human body shameful. Some internal parts of our body, such as our lungs and liver, may not seem so pretty to us, but all of our outward parts, including the sex organs, are honorable and not lacking in beauty."

"Then why do we feel ashamed when we go naked?"

"That's because Adam and Eve disobeyed God and so sin entered the world, and along with sin, immoral passion or wrong sex desire. As a result, self-respecting persons feel a measure of shame at having their private parts exposed to the view of outsiders. In fact, the Bible calls the sex organs of man and woman 'private parts.' For instance, let's read here at Exodus 20:26. You can read this, Johnny."

"It says: 'You must not go up by steps to my altar, that your private parts may not be exposed upon it.'"

"Yes; so the sex organs are private to ourselves and to our marriage mate when we are married. They are not for display or to use by anyone else. In fact, God considers all improper use of the sex organs as unclean. It was because of fornication and other bad practices that God commanded the Israelites to destroy those wicked nations in Palestine."

"But why does God have all these rules about the sex organs?" asks John intently.

"Because God intended for married humans to use them to multiply and bring forth children and populate the earth. Notice what God said here to Adam and Eve at Genesis 1:28: 'Be fruitful and become many and fill the earth.' So God gave man and woman organs to accomplish this holy purpose within marriage. This is why, as you grow older, changes take place in your body. When a boy becomes old enough to be a father, then the sex organs grow larger and begin to secrete a fluid called semen. It's a heavier fluid than water and, although there is not much of it, it contains a great number of tiny cells, any one of which can fertilize the egg and make it grow into a baby. So when married persons have sex relations, these tiny cells, too small to see, swim through the mother's birth canal until one of them finds the egg and unites with it. Then the egg starts to grow and becomes a baby, as I've explained before. So you see, God made the sex organs for a sacred purpose, that of passing on life. That is why they are not playthings. That is why they must be used according to God's rules."

"So God has rules on sex because of babies?"

"Yes, Johnny, that's one of the main reasons. God has rules on sex because he intended that every baby brought into the world should have both a mother and a father who would take all the responsibility of raising that child."

"That's a lot of responsibility!"

"Yes, indeed. So, what if you used the sex organs for a wrong purpose? What if you started a new life through misuse of them? You could ruin the life of a girl and ruin the life of a baby. Moreover, how could a young boy with no job and no home of his own take on the responsibility of providing for a family? A father not only has to have a job and be financially able to support a family but he must have the maturity to be able to spend money wisely and to make the major decisions of family life. But, above all, if the sex organs are used for a wrong purpose, it means disobeying God's laws, and he will judge fornicators, as we read in the Bible."

"I see now why God has rules about sex. But, Dad, now that I understand sex better, do you think it is right to talk about such matters, say among the boys at school?"

"No, I don't. You see, it is a very personal and private matter that you would not want to discuss with just anyone, unless, of course, someone specifically asked you what the Bible teaches on such and such a subject. It is always proper to answer Bible questions. But when it comes to the matter of trying to learn something about sex and marriage, it is best that you learn it at home and not from schoolmates. I say this because so many persons today misuse the sex organs and have a corrupted view of the matter, and their minds are 'in the gutter,' as the expression goes. With so many people not loving God and not being governed by his laws on sex, it is best to keep such discussion in the home as we are doing now until you are much older."

"Dad, I have another question. Sometimes at school or after school I see boys and girls hug and kiss one another. Is it all right for a boy and a girl who like each other to do this?"

"That is not really a wise thing for unmarried persons to do, and I will tell you why. If a boy kisses a girl when none of their parents are present, and the kissing goes on for some time, he is rousing his own sexual desire and hers. He is making love. He has embarked on the first steps of sexual expression that lead ultimately, as God intended, to sex relations. The path is just that direct. It is an old path, well marked by the experience of millions. Moreover, it is a good path. But the question for you is, When are you entitled to travel it? Not until you are married. But if you are with a girl privately and you keep on kissing, there comes a time when it is almost impossible to put on the brakes. It is even harder than eating just one potato chip out of a bowlful and then stopping right there and then with one chip. You want to eat more, and so it is with sexual desire. Maybe you will say you will never get that far, but once the nervous system is excited, it is difficult to reason. So if you cannot travel the normal path of satisfaction, then why begin traveling a course that could only lead to trouble? Even when a couple is engaged to be married, it is not advisable to become too familiar, for certain privileges are only for those who are married. So until that time, it is better to wait."

"But what about just taking a girl out someplace to get acquainted, as some of the older boys do?"

"Anytime you want to get better acquainted with a girl who loves God and his laws, you are welcome to come to the house. It is far better to bring her here when we are home than to take her out alone the way some boys do. So anytime you want to bring a friend home, mother and I will be glad to have you do that, rather than going out alone together."

"Thanks, Dad, you've helped me to solve a lot of little problems that I thought were quite big."

"I'm really pleased we've had this chat, Johnny, and anytime there is something you want to know I am always glad to answer whatever questions you may have."

A Look at Tokyo

I MAY not have been away as long as Ura-shimataro.* He was absent on his tortoise for 700 years. But I have returned after only 300 years, and what a surprise it has been for me, an old samurai, to come back to Edo and find my village transformed into a hustling, bustling metropolis of steel and concrete—this modern giant that they call Tokyo!

You know, I was one of the samurai from Mikawa. As a young man I fought in the battle of Sekigahara, and then when my master Iyeyasu, the first of the Tokugawas, moved the capital from Kyoto to Tokyo, I began to serve as one of the personal guards of the Shogun, the military ruler of the land. There were about 80,000 of us to keep law and order around Edo, and how we men of the two swords loved to boast of our exploits, 'cutting the wind with our shoulders' as we strutted through the village streets! Yes, "village," I say, for back there the town outside the castle moat stretched for only about twelve blocks long by three blocks wide. It was only one of many fishing and farming villages dotted along the pine-clad bay and through the Kanto plains.

However, let me relate my amazing experience. It starts in the cabin of what you moderns call a "jet." This is a new word to me.

Monday: I am awakened by a charming young lady. She is wearing a kimono—rather modernistic I feel, and her dialect is quaint, too, but I can understand. She offers me yokan and manju, along with a tasty blend of green tea. So far, so good. I feel I am in a world I can understand. I look at my traveling companions, both Japanese and high-nosed foreigners, and all of them dressed foreign-style. How has this come about? My Shogun lord distinctly ordered our people to cut themselves off completely from every contact with the outside world.

Suddenly our "jet" turns its nose downward, and in a few moments I see Edo Bay, ships and gray buildings with tall chimneys belching smoke. Soon, a slight bump, a tremendous whirring noise, and we are standing still. There beside me is the largest building I have ever seen. A large red sign reads "Tokyo International Airport." We go inside, and I follow the crowd through interminably long hallways. Then, we have to participate in a strange ritual involving "Quarantine," "Immigration" and "Customs." What should a loyal samurai of our Tokugawa lord want with such things? Someone points at me and whispers, "An actor?" I put my hand to my sword, but then decide not to notice the insult.

Next, we come to some stairs that keep going down of their own accord. I do not have to walk down these stairs. They do the walking for me, as I simply stand on them. A very strange sensation, but I have to start walking again as my stair reaches the bottom position. Now I see a sign that says "Monorail." One of my fellow travelers tells me that this is one of the longest of its kind in the world. Soon this strange carriage brings us above ground and makes a fast journey along the edge of the Bay of Edo. Just fifteen minutes by my companion's wrist clock, and we find ourselves in the heart of old Edo. But what a difference from my village! I am surely glad to find an old-style Japanese inn with tatami flooring, and to bed down between futons—my confused head resting on a rice-husk pillow.

Tuesday: Well, they still eat white rice and bean-paste soup for breakfast here in Edo. A lot of people, though, are also eating what they call pan, from the French. I'm glad I can still get my raw fish.

This morning I decide to visit that tall tower that seems to dominate the city. They call it Tokyo Tower, and say it is even forty feet higher than another tall tower in Paris. It is quite a frightening experience to go up in the "elevator," but the view is well worth it. Looking to the north, I see a familiar sight—a wooded area enclosed by battlements, obviously the walls of the castle built by my lord, Iyeyasu. However, the marshy land and shallow beaches before the castle have all disappeared. The area has been reclaimed as land, and it is now covered by immense buildings. I learn that part of this area is called Ginza, or "Silver Mint," for they used to make silver coins there. They say it is the most valuable land in the world, being worth 18 million dollars an acre, twice the value of land in a place called Manhattan, in America.

As for the tower itself, it is 1,092 feet high, and the antenna on the top is able to transmit "electric waves" to every part of the Kanto plains. All six of the "television stations" in the Tokyo area broadcast through this tower. It is used also for relaying waves from sporting and other events to broadcasting stations, where the waves are adjusted, returned to the tower and then broadcast again out to the homes.

On leaving the tower, I take what they call a "taxi" to the Ginza. Many dub the taxi drivers "suicide pilots," and I agree. Phew! Give me the old palanquin or rickshaw any day. But these are no longer to be seen anywhere, except a few rickshaws at night in the geisha district. I am glad there are still geisha and tea houses in this modern Tokyo, though a little hard to find. But even as I sip tea and chew on dried squid in a side-alley teahouse, I am always confronted by one of those television "eyes." It is not so bad this afternoon, though, as part of the program is sumo wrestling. As I watch those hulking 300-pounders hurling themselves at one another, and the Shinto ritual that accompanies the bouts, I feel that my own age is not altogether in the past.

Wednesday: Someone tells me that Tokyo's rail transport system is worth looking at, so I go to see what they call the "underground." This is indeed a modern idea, to travel through man-made rabbit burrows; but having experienced the congestion of traffic above ground, I can appreciate the wisdom of it. The underground station at Ginza is the largest in the world, and I am amazed at the spotless cleanliness of its platforms, "escalators" and brightly colored carriages. I travel out to the university area, and find that of twelve major universities in the city, some have enrollments of as high as 20,000 students. How seriously the young folk here take their education! And what throngs are crowding the university book-stores and, for that matter, all book and magazine stores throughout the city. My countrymen have certainly become great readers; in fact, I believe the literacy rate in Japan is higher than anywhere else in the world, about 99 percent of the population.

I visit one of the many movie theaters, and see a "samurai" film. They say this is the Japanese equivalent of the American "Western." It is very popular. I am glad, though I note a few that must be from a later day. Then I take the elevated train back to my inn. But foolishly I choose the rush hour. Platform officials have to give an extra shove to the last ones boarding, so the doors will shut. It squeezes all of my breath out of me. With a population of close to 11,000,000, and many others who commute into Tokyo daily from Yokohama and other neighboring areas, the big city certainly has its transport problems, and especially as many of the streets are no wider than the lanes of the villages I used to know. Tokyo is really a lot of small villages that have grown together into one huge village. Where they would be without their underground, and their overhead superhighways, no one knows! But the transport problem is still far from solved.

Thursday: I decide I will get away from the mad rush of the city, and so I visit some of the traditional gardens. Yes, I find some of them, but alas! so few, as it seems most of them have been crowded out by the bustling metropolis. Afternoon and evening I visit the Kabuki Theater and see some Noh plays. I enjoy the leisurely movement of these, but wonder how such tradition could have survived among all the commotion of the big city. After the theater I sample a Western innovation—the coffee shop. The city seems to be full of these places, and they are usually full of people, who smoke and sip their time away while listening to classical music from the West.

Friday: I decide to go shopping, and pick one of those tall department stores on Ginza. An elevator whisks me to the roof, where I find a children's playground and a Shinto shrine. Here I have a good view of the modern buildings of this modern city—and new buildings of steel and concrete are still going up everywhere. Then I walk down from floor to floor. I am amazed at the abundance and variety of the merchandise. Ah, but the basement is what takes my fancy! Here is one tremendous floor set out tastefully with food delicacies of every kind, both the modern and those belonging to my own age. Preserved and fresh fish of a multitude of varieties, seaweeds, rice and sweet-bean cookies, everything to tickle the connoisseur's palate.

Tonight I visit a modern theater, and am delighted by the clever mixture of traditional Japanese and Western dances. The streets are interesting at night, too—a blaze of colorful neon signs, some in the picturesque Japanese characters, others in plain Roman characters.

Saturday: During the morning I take in some of Tokyo's modern factories. I am surprised at the skill with which workers, many of them young girls, fit parts to such complicated mechanisms as cameras, transistor radios, television sets and the like. The industry and skill of my people are obviously strong reasons for the present flood of prosperity. I am told that practically every household has a washing machine and television. Many have refrigerators. The average personal income has doubled during the past ten years, to about $560 a year throughout the nation. Half-year and year-end bonuses often total to as much as a half-year's wages. Though a worker's salary may be considered low at a little over a dollar a day, yet there are often compensating benefits, such as cheap accommodations, meals and hospital care, together with recreational facilities, in company-owned apartments and projects.

Later I see the huge stadiums where the Olympic games, an importation from Greece, were held in the fall of 1964—fine examples of modern architecture with a distinctly Japanese flavor. Then I go to another huge stadium and join about 40,000 "fans" in watching a strange innovation from America—baseball. Why should people go so crazy about watching a little white ball being knocked about?

But I am glad the old Japan is still represented here in many ways. Especially do I enjoy hearing familiar noises. There is the shrill voice of the seashell vendor early in the morning, and later I hear those of the bamboo and goldfish vendors. There is the reedy horn of the bean-curd man and the tinkling bell of the flower wagon. And late at night the noodles man serenades the neighborhood with his piercing whistle. I buy a bowl of noodles to top off the rice wine I have been drinking. How like samurai days!

Sunday: It is strangely quiet today. Until recently every day used to be hustle and commotion, except on our national holidays about ten times in the year. But now we have what is known as a "week," and every seventh day is taken as a vacation day by most people. They say this idea comes from Christendom, where many people take a rest day to go to "church." Here in Japan we are Buddhists and Shintoists, and do not go anywhere regularly for worship. But our religion is convenient, like the religion of Christendom, for ceremonials such as dedicating babies to our religion, and conducting weddings and funerals.

People in Tokyo do not seem too serious about religion anymore. In fact, since World War II ended in the nation's defeat, the traditional Buddhism and Shintoism appear to have suffered an eclipse. Many have lost confidence or interest in them. No doubt it is as a result of this vacuum that new sects have mushroomed recently, so that we have more than 150 sects of Buddhism, and among them that militant group, Soka Gakkai, which claims to have captured over four million households. But I cannot say I like the forced-conversion methods of Soka Gakkai, and much less their political campaigning. No one seems to know what is their ultimate aim, not even their own members, unless it is to conquer the world, as many of them claim they are going to do.

Tonight I'm going to get out of this huge city. I'm taking the bullet express to Kyoto. It will get me there in less than four hours at 125 miles an hour. Why, that trip used to take us samurai weeks on foot! And I have something interesting to read for the journey. This afternoon, as I was walking down No. 2 National Highway, just beyond Keio University, I saw a tall, new building with a large sign on it: "Watch Tower." So I went in and inquired what this meant. A young man explained to me the hope of a God-given new order that will unite all mankind in eternal peace. Even as a samurai, I've seen my fill of war, and I wouldn't mind taking off my swords for good. So while en route on the bullet, I'm going to read these two magazines the young man gave me, The Watchtower and Awake!—Written by Japanese "Awake!" correspondent.

Man's Losing Fight Against

THE ELEMENTS

FOR hours, on April 11, American radio and television announcers were busy warning listeners of the possibility of tornadoes. Especially was this true in the storm path called "Tornado Alley," below the Great Lakes. Conditions that breed tornadoes were clearly visible. But in the "alley" tornado warnings are old stuff, so many ignored them. Others wisely sought refuge.

Then the tornadoes came—in clusters. Frightful, twisting funnels swooping down from black, swirling mushroom clouds, destroying everything in their paths. In less than 10 hours, 37 twisters tore through six states, leaving 243 people dead, over 5,000 injured and countless others homeless, while the cost in property damage ran to more than $235,000,000. The death toll was greater than that recorded from tornadoes throughout the United States in an average year. In two days the number of tornadoes rose to 45, as the season moved toward its peak.

Wayne Rose, a farmer near Shannondale, Indiana, described what had happened to him the evening of April 11. He noticed that it had become very dark rather suddenly. So he stepped outside of his large frame house and found weather conditions a bit eerie. The sky was a greenish black. "It was as quiet as a morgue," he said. Then he heard what sounded like a dozen express trains coming directly at him.

(Tornadoes have been heard as far as twenty-five miles away, as much as an hour before arrival.) There it was, said Rose, not an upright funnel in the sky, but one lying almost on its side. Its motion was awesome as it snaked across the fields coming toward the house.

"I shoved the family into the Buick, but it outran us." The car rose and twisted in the air as if a mighty hand had lifted it and had given it a spin; it jerked and bounced. There was a roar of noise beyond description. The house, barn and silo exploded into shreds. And just that suddenly it was all over. A lifetime of hard work lay in a heap. A barbed wire fence had caught bits of gaily colored cloth blown from the closets that no longer existed. The trees in the driveway appeared twisted and twisted again, then torn apart. The washing machine, wrenched from its plumbing, was standing in the middle of the field some distance from the house. It was heartbreaking.

In the distance groans and screams of neighbors could be heard. But the Rose family had survived without any serious personal injuries to themselves. The car that saved them was battered and muddy, but that is about all. The neighbors, however, did not fair so well. Only a few homes in this section of the country have storm cellars, for tornadoes are not common this far north, said Rose. "But you can bet your bottom dollar everyone around here is going to build one now."

What the Twisters Did

Over and over again, on April 11, deadly funnels dropped from the black sky. Their power was violent, fierce and insuppressible. A trailer park in Indiana with 92 trailers was leveled. "What a sight!" said the county sheriff. "It was an unbelievable mess. . . . Everyone I saw was covered with blood." The twisters derailed fifty freight cars near Shelby, Ohio; rolled up a new blacktop road in Michigan like a carpet; pushed planks through solid masonry walls at Crystal Lake, Illinois; smashed factories in Indiana; wrapped aluminum siding around utility poles in Mount Gilead, Ohio; wrenched metal guard rails from concrete posts along Indiana highways; lifted cars, trucks and a bus from roads in five states.

There is nothing selective in tornado fury. New and old cars were squeezed together like accordions, or they exploded as if by dynamite. Old homes and luxury mansions were reduced to scrap lumber.

One of the twisters missed a Kingdom Hall of Jehovah's witnesses in Elkhart, Indiana, by about a quarter of a mile while the Watchtower study was being conducted. A couple had just left their home for the meeting five minutes before the twister charged through the trailer park where they lived, killing at least 45 people and leveling all the trailers in the park. A second tornado missed the Kingdom Hall by only about 100 yards. The hall is right by highway 33 and frightened passersby crowded in for shelter.

Ambulances were still shuttling back and forth to the hospital from the first tornado. Cars and trucks were also hauling victims. Hailstones as big as golf balls started to fall. In Graham, Texas, hailstones seven and a half inches in diameter pounded the town in the wake of a tornado. At Electra, the library building's roof caved in under the weight of a virtual cloudburst.

The tornadoes brought death to old and young alike. A home for the aged was struck. Five died when a bus was blown over. At Greentown a tornado snatched a two-week-old baby from her mother's arms as she was running for cover. The baby was dashed against a wall, where it died instantly. Another child was sucked out of a house in Strongsville, Ohio, and hurled to its death while still in its bassinet. Dead pets and livestock littered the countryside. President Lyndon B. Johnson, who toured the stricken area, said: "I've never seen such complete destruction." He assured the disaster victims the government would help to get them back on their feet again.

It is bad enough to suffer a disaster of this sort through no fault of your own, but to have people steal from you at a time like this is heartless indeed! In the Chicago area, efforts to erase some of the scars of the tornadoes were hampered by looters—professional looters who follow the storms merely to prey on victims. In Indiana one man found his father dead and went for a stretcher. When he returned, his father's pockets had been turned inside out. Officers in Marion, Indiana, used police dogs to halt about 75 looters attempting to clean out a shattered shopping center. How degenerate can one be?

What Caused the Tornadoes?

Meteorologists state that the tornadoes of April 11 were spawned when cold, dry air moving south from Canada collided with the warm, moist air moving north from the Gulf of Mexico. This resulted in a squall line at an unusual speed of 46 miles an hour, bringing thunderstorms and tornadoes. The jet stream, speeding eastward 200 miles an hour at an altitude of 35,000 feet, influenced the storm's intensity and direction. While there were 37 tornadoes reported, the number has little meaning, because a single funnel may drop repeatedly to the ground, or it may cut a swath close to 100 miles in length. The twisters that struck the Middle States were as much as a mile wide—three times the normal maximum width of such storms. The funnels pack fierce winds that have been estimated at 500 miles an hour.

The path of a tornado can be so erratic that there is no way of telling precisely where it will strike. In fact, one man from the Weather Bureau said: "The only way we can identify a tornado is to see it," notwithstanding radar and all the other weather equipment. The twister can move in circles, stop, make a U-turn and perform all sorts of capers. That is why there is no effective way at present to warn those in the immediate path of a tornado. The best that can be done is warn people of the possibility of such storms.

The communities hit by the tornadoes in April were alerted thirty-five minutes to five hours before the tornadoes struck. But there were a number of things that worked against the warning system. Telephone lines were busy in some sections. It was a Sunday and many families were outside and out of reach of warning. The Lebanon, Indiana, Reporter said that, when an alarm is sounded, "the attitude of most is that of concern but not of alarm. No one wants to immediately take refuge in a ditch or cellar everytime a storm warning is given. And coupled with that is the attitude that it can happen to the other guy . . . but it will never happen to my home. Well, this time it did happen to our homes." Perhaps greater concern for warnings is a lesson for all to learn—whether they come from the weatherman or the minister who calls at your door. Sometimes there is no second chance.

Flood Disasters

As if tornadoes were not bad enough, the worst flood in the history of the Upper Mississippi River rampaged through the St. Paul lowlands during that same week, forcing tens of thousands of families to evacuate their homes. The Mississippi River climbed 23 feet in two weeks. It finally reached a 26-foot crest on April 18, from which it inched down. Only a plywood-and-sandbag extension protected industries and homes on the banks. To the north of St. Paul and in every other direction, armies of volunteers worked in shifts around the clock raising the dikes. Dynamite blasts were used to loosen ice jams. "I'm through with the river," said Ed Custer, who has lived and battled the river for most of his 75 years. The river wrenched his house from its foundation and sent it downstream, where it crashed into a bridge and broke up.

The flood has made about 40,000 people homeless and caused property damage estimated at nearly $60,000,000 in Minnesota and Wisconsin alone. Thirteen deaths have been attributed to the floods.

A yellow sign poking above the water read: "You Are Entering Lilydale." But Lilydale, a village of 140 persons, was out of sight some ten feet beneath the muddy Mississippi. Mayor Floyd W. Anger's home has been flooded out five times in seventeen years. This time it moved 150 feet from its foundation. How do the people feel about being flooded out? "They all say they won't come back, but they do," said Mayor Anger. "Myself, I'm not giving up." A Lilydale painter, Norman Walker, reflected the mood of the mayor: "We're going right back in as soon as the water goes down." But why? "I couldn't tell you. I don't know," he said. Maybe it is because the Lilydale residents feel they have nowhere else to go, and perhaps hope the water will not be as high next time.

Whatever the emotions at times like these in this age of atomic, space spectacles, one thing is certain—that much more could be done here on earth to make it a more secure place for man to live.

THE most prominent city mentioned in the Word of God is Jerusalem. Its name appears upward of 825 times. It is not surprising, then, that we should find this name being used to refer to more than just the literal city of Jerusalem.

The literal city of Jerusalem has a history that goes back to the time of the Hebrew patriarch Abraham. At that time its name was Salem. From the time of King David onward until the Babylonian demolition thereof it was the capital of the nation of Israel, and even centuries after the restoration in 537 B.C.E. it was called "the city of the great King."—Matt. 5:35; Gen. 14:18.

This city of Jerusalem is at times referred to as a mother of the Jews, as when the apostle Paul likens her to Abraham's slave girl, saying: "Now this Hagar means Sinai, a mountain in Arabia [where the Ten Commandments were given to the Jews], and she corresponds with the Jerusalem today, for she is in slavery with her children." In Paul's day the nation of Jews was in bondage to Judaism and its traditions.—Gal. 4:25.

A city such as Jerusalem is an organization. This being so, it is quite fitting that we should find that the city of Jerusalem is used to symbolize or represent other organizations that bear a likeness to it. One of these organizations that is also named Jerusalem is the entire heavenly organization of Jehovah, consisting of all his faithful spirit creatures (and those Christians in line to become his spirit sons) that are joined to Him in a bond of faithfulness as a good wife is joined to her husband. This heavenly Jerusalem is referred to by Isaiah when he says: "Cry out joyfully, you barren woman that did not give birth! . . . For your grand Maker is your husbandly owner, Jehovah of armies being his name." That this woman is indeed God's heavenly organization Paul shows at Galatians 4:26, 27, by applying this prophecy to "the Jerusalem above" and saying she "is free," and she "is our mother"—the mother of the spiritual Jews or Christians, just as the earthly city of Jerusalem was the mother of the natural Jews. This organization is also termed "heavenly Jerusalem."—Isa. 54:1, 5; Heb. 12:22.

Another organization is termed "New Jerusalem" and she is the daughter of the "Jerusalem above." She is the bride, the wife of Christ, even as "Jerusalem above" is the wife of Jehovah God. While God's "woman" consists of unnumbered millions of spirit creatures, the bride of Christ is limited to 144,000 members. Concerning her we read: "I saw also the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God and prepared as a bride adorned for her husband."—Rev. 21:2; 14:1, 3.

Then are those comprising the "New Jerusalem" also part of the "Jerusalem above"? Yes. The designation "capital organization" as distinguished from Jehovah's "universal organization" is helpful in this regard. How so? In that a capital city is also a part of the nation of which it is the capital. Thus the "New Jerusalem," the heavenly bride, along with her Bridegroom, Jesus Christ, comprises the capital part of Jehovah's universal organization, and it is this capital organization, rather than the universal organization, that is the "burdensome stone" of Zechariah 12:3.

We come now to Jesus' prophecy regarding the Jerusalem trampled on, as recorded for us at Luke 21:24, which reads, in part: "Jerusalem will be trampled on by the nations, until the appointed times of the nations are fulfilled." Which Jerusalem is here referred to?

"Jerusalem" here is used to mean more than just a city; it carries with it the dominating thing that is associated with the city.

It will help us to identify the specific sense in which Jerusalem is here used by Jesus Christ if we note just what are the "appointed times of the nations." As shown time and again in the Watch Tower publications, the books of Revelation and Daniel indicate that these appointed times of the nations cover 2,520 years. These began when the Kingdom of Judah at Jerusalem was overthrown in 607 B.C.E., and lasted until 1914 C.E.

Why could not this prophecy specifically refer only to literal Jerusalem as being trampled on? For at least two good reasons. First of all, Jesus clearly indicated that the Jewish nation was rejected by Jehovah in his day, and he held out no hope of its being restored. (Matt. 21:33-46; 23:37, 38) Secondly, the literal Jerusalem that was trampled on by the nations was destroyed in the year 70 C.E. and was never rebuilt by the Jews. The Romans built a city there in 130 C.E. and called it Aelia Capitolina. Later, the name Jerusalem was given to this city as if sacred to Christians, but it never became really a Jewish city. In modern years Jews have built near and outside this walled city, out of which any Jews therein were driven by the Arabs in 1948 C.E. A Jewish Jerusalem now exists outside and west of the old walled city held by the Kingdom of Jordan. So any Gentile trampling on this literal old city is of no importance in the matter.

Could the Jerusalem trampled on be the same as the symbolic "burdensome stone" of Zechariah 12:3, namely, Jesus Christ and the New Jerusalem? No, because, for one thing, the first ones called to be part of this "New Jerusalem" were begotten by God's spirit for that purpose at Pentecost 33 C.E., more than 600 years after the appointed times of the nations began at the desolation of Judah and Jerusalem in 607 B.C.E.

The key to just what is chiefly referred to here is furnished by the prophecy at Ezekiel 21:27: "A ruin, a ruin, a ruin I shall make it. As for this also, it will certainly become no one's until he comes who has the legal right, and I must give it to him." From its context it is clear that this prophecy refers to the overthrow of Judah's last king of earthly Jerusalem in 607 B.C.E.

Jehovah God had promised King David that his dynasty would be "established to time indefinite." Although interrupted in 607 B.C.E., it was to be restored when 'he came who had the legal right,' namely, Jesus Christ in Kingdom power, even as can be seen from the words of the angel Gabriel to Mary, namely, that her son Jesus would receive the throne of David.—2 Sam. 7:12-16; Luke 1:32, 33.

So Jerusalem as the capital and site of the king and the temple would well represent the kingdom of the dynasty of King David, who sat upon "Jehovah's throne." She could fittingly be said to be trampled on so long as God's kingdom, as functioning through David's house, was kept in a low, inoperative condition, under the feet of Gentile powers, as it were, until the "appointed times of the nations" were fulfilled in 1914 C.E. Then the prophetic words of Jehovah had their fulfillment: "I, even I, have installed my king upon Zion, my holy mountain. Ask of me, that I may give nations as your inheritance and the ends of the earth as your own possession." This rule by Jesus Christ, however, extends far beyond what was included in God's covenant with David, for he rules from "heavenly Jerusalem" and over all the earth.—Ps. 2:6, 8; Heb. 12:22.

At that time was also fulfilled the prophecy: "We thank you, Jehovah God, . . . because you have taken your great power and begun ruling as king. But the nations became wrathful." No question about the nations becoming wrathful as never before in 1914. Then this "Jerusalem," or God's kingdom as functioning through the house of David, became operative, no longer trampled on, but now set high over all the nations.—Rev. 11:15-18.

WATCHING THE WORLD

Dominican Coup

◆ A military coup toppled the government of Donald Reid Cabral in the Dominican Republic on April 25. Violence continued to flare up and many aliens were evacuated. The revolt was the eighth overturn of government in this Caribbean nation since the assassination of the Roman Catholic dictator Generalissimo Rafael L. Trujillo Molinas in May 1961. Trujillo ruled for 32 years.

War on Crime

◆ An editorial in the New York Times, April 24, referred to a massive increase in crime in America as "a nationwide phenomenon since World War II." It stated that students of the problem seem to agree that among its major causes are the decline "in influence of the family, the church and other nongovernmental agencies, and the huge migrations to the great cities." New York City's answer to crime was an enlarged police force. The quota of the Police Department will be increased July 1 to a record high of 28,228. The cost to the people will be above $25,000,000. In the first 3 months of 1965 the number of major crimes in New York City rose to an all-time high of 43,724, an increase of 1.7 percent over the first quarter of 1964. Perhaps stiffer penalties and swifter justice should also be considered as deterrents.

Sense of Justice

◆ Eighteen months ago an elderly man entered Gerald Weaver's pawnshop with a violin. The elderly man received $40 for it. Now the pawnbroker has been offered $3,500 for the 132-year-old violin. He wrote to the former owner of the instrument offering to share the profit. But why do this? Why share the profits? Weaver replied: "It doesn't seem right to make so much money on a $40 loan." More loan companies should have Weaver's heart.

Rodent Control

◆ The Times of India, March 25, revealed that the rats eat as much food as the entire Indian population. The rat population was estimated at 240 crores (against 40 crores of Indians) and six rats are said to consume as much if not more food than a man does in a day. India, being hard-pressed for food, is now pressing hard to control rodents.

Chileans Riot

◆ A rise of 50 percent in Santiago bus fares and other increases in the prices of commodities as a result of inflation have brought about protests in Chile. Railroad employees have called a partial strike.

High school students have poured out into the streets to voice their protest. From Santiago protest demonstrations have spread rapidly to other cities. There have been clashes with the police, stone throwing, arrests, the use of water and tear gas and many wounds. Officials agree there is no simple solution.

Faulty Schools

◆ Hungarian schools are criticized as being out of step with reality. A leading Hungarian Communist, Istvan Szirmai, stated that there still "exist contradictions between the subject taught and reality." He went on to say of the school system: "We show the youth too smooth a path, we fail to point to the sources of trouble and difficulties in life. Our youth cannot understand that there is a prescription for everything in their textbooks and yet they see how difficult it is to remedy difficulties and trouble in actual life. Our youth expect an answer to the problems of today." This is not a problem that is limited to Communist lands.

Unsullable Witness

◆ A United Press International published report from Maidenhead, England, recently stated that Maurice Sheppard was charged with being the owner of a dangerous and uncontrolled dog. Sheppard stated the charge was untrue and pleaded with the court for permission to present the dog as a witness. Sheppard's request was denied. The reason: there was no way of getting the dog to "take the oath."

Belsen in Memory

◆ The 20th anniversary of the liberation of prisoners from Belsen Nazi concentration camp was celebrated on April 25 with a brief ceremony held on the spot. But there were few signs left of the camp that had been "an inferno," as a speaker described it.

Twenty years of rain and change have washed away almost completely all the physical traces of the concentration camp. Now there are only the simple inscriptions left for survivors to read: "Here rest 2,500 unknown dead." "Here rest 5,000 dead." In all, 51,000 people died in Belsen; among them were Christian witnesses of Jehovah. Liberation ceremonies were also staged in Buchenwald and Dachau concentration camps.

Studying the Stars

◆ A ringed galaxy millions of light years from the earth has been found. The distant galaxy called M-81 has a huge ring of luminous gas believed to be caused by high-energy electrons. Since the galaxy, M-81, which is a huge island universe of stars about 10 million light years from the earth, is of a type similar to our own, the discovery was considered significant. It may cast some light on studies about the huge star system of which the sun is a very minor part.

Alarmed over Homosexuality

◆ A leading newspaper in Cuba warned on April 15 of the increase of homosexuality in Cuba, which has become "an alarming political and social matter." Sexual deviates reportedly have infiltrated intellectual and art life. The paper recommended that some ballet dance troupes be disbanded rather than for them to continue as centers of immorality. The paper El Mundo (The World) of Havana described homosexuality as a big-city phenomenon.

Poisonous Plants

◆ Children and many adults have the bad habit of chewing on things they know little or nothing about. With summer coming on apace, perhaps a word of caution might be in order. The U.S. Public Health Service estimates that 12,000 children each year are poisoned by plants. Marjorie May, director of the Home and Education Division of the Greater New York Safety Council, stated that there are more than 700 species of plants that are known to have caused illness or death and some of these plants grow in the garden, the playground and around picnic areas. Take, for example, the leaf of the peach tree. It looks harmless enough, yet it contains one of the most dangerous poisons known, hydrocyanic acid. Deadly cyanide is packaged in twigs of the cherry tree. And the leaf blades of rhubarb contain oxalic acid that causes severe kidney damage.

A published United Press International dispatch, April 1, says: "The flowers of the narcissus, hyacinth and daffodil are lovely. But poison from the bulbs causes nausea, vomiting and diarrhea, and can be fatal. Attractively striped 'dumb cane' and the familiar 'elephant ears' both contain crystals of calcium oxalate which cause painful swelling of the mouth and tongue severe enough to close off air passages of the throat. One leaf from the flamboyant poinsettia can kill a child. There is enough poison in a dime packet of castor bean seeds to kill five children. . . . Berries attract little fingers—but berries from daphne, nightshade and moonseed (which resembles wild grape) can kill. Jimson weed (also called stinkweed or thorn apple) grows in abundance and is considered responsible for more poisonings than any other plant."

Enrollment and Spending

◆ According to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, spending on public schools has been increasing almost three times as fast as pupil enrollment. In the last decade enrollment increased 43 percent, while spending rose 157 percent. About 95 percent of the increased spending came from local and state taxes and bonds. Five percent came from the federal government.

Spying Made Easy

◆ In recent years, the odious profession of spying has gained a new kind of respectability. Few are executed. Many are sent back to their homeland. The business itself has undergone refinement. For example, the United States Senate investigating committee was told of an electronic martini. The olive contained a microphone and the antenna was in the toothpick. Today one can purchase for $18.95 a small dish-type antenna called the "Big Ear," which magnifies sound a million times and can monitor conversation a block away. There is also a laser-type beam that can be aimed at a room several blocks away and transmit back a television picture, with sound. Reported also is a small transmitter that can monitor telephone conversations from a great distance, and is practically undetectable. A long-range eavesdropping device that can monitor transoceanic telephone calls was demonstrated for those who entertained doubts. Private detective Harold Lipset from San Francisco said that there were 10,000 businesses in northern California that used snooping devices to spy on their employees. He also stated that 5,000 federal government offices have eavesdropping devices. Man's home or "castle"—this traditional bastion of privacy—is threatened to become a fish bowl because of snoopers.

Attendance Frustrations

◆ A published Associated Press dispatch for March 12 reported a cleric as saying that he felt that his mission was a failure. He described South London as a place of "derelict churches, bleak-hearted clergy and disheartened congregations." Nicolas D. Stacey, rector of Woolwich, wrote: "We have had a remarkable opportunity of making a breakthrough in getting people to come to church. We have played every card in the pack. We have done everything we set out to do. But we have achieved virtually not one of the modest things we hoped for." Stacey stated that bingo in the church hall has done more than anything else to create a community spirit. But the layman who runs the bingo sessions does not go to church. "I haven't the time," he says. A massive house-to-house-visiting campaign was tried. "But one of our staff said after house-to-house visiting six hours a day for six months that not one extra person had been to church as a result," Stacey said. So that his often empty church gets some use, he has pooled resources with the YMCA and shares the building with the Presbyterians, who meet there at different times.

Unbalanced Justice

◆ Rich or poor, the United States citizens are entitled to equal justice. But promise and practice in American law can sometimes be worlds apart. For refusing to compromise one's conscience, Christians have been sentenced to five years in a federal prison. But confessed criminals who, last year, on October 29, 1964, stole priceless jewels from the Museum of Natural History in New York, received a meager three-year sentence. And should the ruby be returned before the defendants complete serving their first one-year sentence, it was understood that the two other one-year sentences would be suspended for each defendant. These thieves stole the Star of India sapphire and more than 20 other gems, that were once valued at $400,000. There can be no equal justice when the sentence a man gets depends on the amount of money he has or the type of deal he can make with the law.

Bester I

◆ Bester I is the first new comet discovered in 1965. It is named after the South African astronomer who located it. The comet, of the 10th magnitude, is far beyond the range of man's natural vision. But it is another heavenly wonder that declares the glory of God.

A Tomato Tree

◆ Earth lovers can rejoice in this planet's marvelous potential. For example, Sydney, Australia, has a tomato plant that has become a tree. The plant is ten feet high and six feet wide. For months it has yielded four pounds of tomatoes a week. "The thing has gone mad," said its owner. "I have had to turn it back because I couldn't open the house windows on that side. It is certainly a freak plant."

LIFE in a Paradise

The word "paradise" means many things to many people. But "paradise" as explained in the Bible surpasses man's imagination. Eden contained a paradise garden in the beginning. It was to have been man's home for eternity. But man's right to that home as forfeited by Adam is not to be lost forever. Read the fascinating and faith-inspiring book From Paradise Lost to Paradise Regained. The hope it holds out for the future is unequalled, because it is based on the Bible. Send only 5/6 (for Australia, 6/6; for South Africa, 55c).

Hardbound, gold-embossed coral cover; clear large type; beautiful descriptive illustrations throughout; 256 pages, same size as this magazine. Simple straightforward language, a delight to young and old.

"GIVE US MORE FAITH"

Is that your request?

Many sincere persons today look at religion in disappointment. They are discouraged by religious leaders who show a marked preference for material advancement over spiritual growth. They have become impatient with the constant demands and the meager returns, with the concentration of interest on politics and social reforms rather than the "gospel" and the way of salvation. Many have even become suspicious of the Bible itself because of "science" and "higher criticism" taught from the pulpit. Is it any wonder that, with so many persons, materialistic philosophy is replacing faith in God and his Word?
